Hello [REDACTED]

I want to respond directly to your statement that this matter is not related to Google Skills.

Since inception, my inquiry has arisen from my consumer experience with the certificate program offered under the Google brand and advertised through Google Skills, Grow with Google, and Google Career Certificates. The representations made at the point of sale—including employer recognition, hiring alignment, and integration within a broader Google-branded career pathway—were inducements material to my decision to enroll.

When I have sought clarification regarding how those representations function in practice, I have been told that separate entities are responsible. That may describe internal structure. It does not resolve the consumer-facing concern.

Segmentation after purchase does not negate inducement at the point of sale. Because the certificate is marketed as part of an integrated Google initiative, questions regarding the accuracy and practical meaning of those representations are necessarily related to the entity through which they were communicated.

Declaring the matter “unrelated,” without identifying the correct routing authority, leaves the consumer without a defined locus of responsibility while the underlying representation remains in effect.

If Google Skills is not the appropriate body to address concerns regarding the representations made in connection with the certificate program, please identify the specific department within Google responsible for oversight of those marketing claims and value positioning.

This is not about compelling outcomes. It is about clarity regarding responsibility for the representations that induced enrollment.

Clarity requires a defined locus of responsibility and a defined point of contact.

I would appreciate a direct routing answer.

Thank you,

Hi [REDACTED]

Thank you for your detailed and thoughtfully articulated message. We appreciate the clarity with which you've outlined your concern and the distinction you've drawn between internal organizational structure and consumer-facing representations.

We understand that your inquiry relates specifically to representations associated with the certificate program marketed under the Google brand, including references to employer recognition, hiring alignment, and broader career pathway integration. Your request for clarity regarding responsibility and oversight is noted.

To clarify:

Google Skills Support is responsible for assistance related to the Google Skills platform experience, including access, technical issues, learning paths, lab functionality, badges issued directly within this environment.

The Google Career Certificates program (including marketing representations, employer consortium information, hiring alignment statements, and value positioning) is administered under the Grow with Google initiative. Oversight of program structure, marketing communications, and employer-related representations falls under the Grow with Google / Google Career Certificates program team rather than Google Skills Support.

If you enrolled through a third-party learning platform (such as Coursera), program delivery and certain marketing disclosures may also involve that platform's support and policy teams.

Thanks for your understanding. Any further inquiries regarding employment or corporate practices should be directed to the appropriate channels.

We wish you the very best in your future professional endeavors.

Regards,
